

Where Are They Now? Featuring Jordan Kryshak

Jordan Kryshak, volunteer and previous board member

Did you know independent studies confirm that JA students are more likely as adults to earn more, own their own businesses, and move out of poverty than the public at large? Junior Achievement programs are focused on preparing young people with the skills they need to transition into the workplace, succeed in their careers, and enrich our local communities.

Today we're featuring Jordan Kryshak as one of the many JA students and volunteers that have gone on to top positions and successful careers in their fields. Jordan is a JA volunteer who shared her time as Director of Operations for AIG Travel in Stevens Point with her role as a recent Board member for JA's Portage & Wood County area. AIG is one of the most successful multi-national companies in the world.

"Supporting JA is something that has allowed me to come full circle with the program," said Jordan. "As a native to the Portage County Area, these were opportunities I was provided throughout my education. Finding myself in a position to give back to JA and our area youth has been nothing short of incredible. Having children of my own, I am incredibly passionate about the curriculum and the experiences they too will one day be able to participate in."

The Director of Operations is responsible for managing the company's daily activities which requires working closely with department heads and upper management to find ways to execute new growth directives, increase sales and employee retention, and improve customer satisfaction.

Jordan and her fellow JA alumni often share how Junior Achievement was an eye-opening experience which exposed them to new ways of thinking, broadened their horizons, showed them new work and career opportunities, and motivated them as life-long learners to succeed.
